CENTRAL KENTUCKY COUNCIL FOR PEACE AND JUSTICE

May 2016

The Be SMART Campaign

Laura B. Johnsrude

Owning a gun is a personal decision, but responsible storage is a public safety issue. Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America advocates for public safety measures that respect the Second Amendment and also protect people from gun violence. To raise awareness and educate the public, Moms has developed the Be SMART Campaign to promote responsible gun ownership and reduce gun deaths.

Moms Demand Action has a chapter in every state and each chapter has volunteers trained and available to deliver a 20-minute presentation entitled “Be SMART: A Conversation about Kids, Guns, and Safety” to local groups and organizations — PTAs, book clubs, community centers, family reunions.

Since 1.7 million American children live in homes with guns that are both loaded and unlocked, the Be SMART campaign has a huge potential audience. Especially since a Harvard study has shown that more than two-thirds of kids know where their parents keep their guns.

Every year, more than 400 kids aged 17 and under die by suicide with a gun, and around 100 children aged 17 and under die in unintentional shootings. The public can change these statistics by having open conversations about guns, kids, and safety.

Adults have a responsibility to protect vulnerable kids, to make sure children never have unauthorized access to unsecured guns. At a Be SMART presentation, we learn how to model responsible behavior around guns, how to inquire about the presence of guns in other homes, how to recognize the risks of teen suicide, and how to spread the word so we can help change those grim statistics.

Join us in the campaign to reduce child gun deaths. Visit BeSMARTforkids.org to learn more and get involved.

The Central Kentucky Council for Peace and Justice has invited Moms Demand Action to give their presentation at the June 1 board meeting, and has invited the public to attend.

For more information, contact Carolyn Halcomb, chalcombKY@gmail.com.

Laura is the State Communications Lead for the Kentucky Chapter of Moms Demand Action.

People of faith demand action to fix broken immigration laws

by Bishop John Stowe

Can you imagine children returning home from school and not finding their parents there? Kids waiting until past their bedtime and their parents still not coming home—and the children not knowing their parents won't be coming home because they have been deported?

As a pastor I have seen such situations, but many people in our nation do not believe that this happens here. In 2011 alone more than 5,000 children who are U.S. citizens were living in foster care after a parent's detention or deportation.

Year after year, and election cycle after election cycle, the United States has failed to pass comprehensive immigration reform. It seems that every time a serious effort is made to bring U.S. immigration law up to date, to correspond to real needs in the labor force, and to be humanitarian in the unification of families, a campaign of misinformed rhetoric, questionable data, and fear-mongering is unleashed. This results in further failure to act and further hysteria about security at the borders.

There have been bi-partisan coalitions of business leaders, government officials, law enforcement personnel, human rights advocates, and religious leaders who all recognize the sanity and the necessity of making legal immigration a possibility for hardworking people who have a need to come to this country to survive and provide for their families.

The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, along with numerous church bodies, has spent decades advocating for fair immigration laws. There has been no call to do away with protection of the borders, nor any denial of the sovereign nation's rights to control its borders. The call has been to make the process fair and accessible for the benefit of all. This still has not happened.

Given the reality of deportations profoundly disrupting family life and disproportionately punishing the working poor, President Barack Obama expressed exasperation with the congressional failure. He took executive action in the area of enforcement, clearly in the domain of the executive branch of government.

Before even addressing the merits of the president's actions, it should be noted that the president himself has been slow to address immigration reform, weak in pursuing it as a priority, and complicit in presiding over the greatest number of removals and deportations of the undocumented.

In November 2014, Obama announced executive immigration initiatives including the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents (DAPA) and expanded Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA). These initiatives set very specific requirements to provide work permits for millions of undocumented immigrants. In February 2015, a federal court in Texas issued a national order putting these initiatives on hold. The Obama administration appealed to the Fifth District U.S. Court of Appeals, but a divided court, upheld the Texas federal district court's order. At the administration's request, the Supreme Court heard the case on April 18.

The Supreme Court should recognize that both Republican and Democratic presidents have issued numerous executive orders on immigration. Presidents have broad constitutional authority to set priorities for federal law enforcement agencies. Legal scholars of a variety of political leanings recognize that the president's actions are within the limits of his authority.

People of faith find repeated admonitions to welcome the stranger and protect the alien in the Judeo-Christian Scriptures and should be anxious to see the Supreme Court affirm the executive orders to allow 5 million more people to work without fear of family separation through deportation.

The immigration system by all accounts is broken, and the will to fix it has not overcome its many obstacles. Upholding the president's executive action to halt deportations will make a difference in many lives, and is the right, compassionate and fair thing to do.

We don't need much, but we do need a little bit to make sure that we are able to both keep the organization solvent and to underwrite the requests for funds that we receive from peace and justice groups in central Kentucky. The more households that participate, the more financial support the organization will receive from Kroger.

If you have not yet taken the opportunity to support CKCPJ in this way, now would be a great time to register.

Karen Conley new CKCPJ co-chair

by Margaret Gabriel, Editor

Karen Conley has accepted the invitation to serve as co-chair of the Central Kentucky Council for Peace and Justice. She joins David Christiansen, fulfilling CKCPJ's tradition of sharing leadership responsibility equally between men and women.

Karen is a long-time activist who founded Kentuckians for Responsible Gun Legislation and is a strong supporter of Moms Demand Action. She is vice-president of the Kentucky Chapter of National Organization for Women and a member of the economic justice committee of Kentuckians for the Commonwealth.

Karen has attended CKCPJ events and participated in the 2016 Peace Networking event with Kentucky NOW. Committees focusing on wage disparity intersect well with her work with and for women. She said, "I'd like to help in any way I can."

Karen grew up in Lexington, and after living in other places, including overseas, returned to Kentucky. She now lives on a five-acre farm where cats mingle with raccoons.

CKCPJ Committee Reports

The Social Action Committee recently decided to limit its focus to its efforts on housing justice, according to committee chair Rick Clewett. Committee members decided on April 13 to launch lobbying and public education in September 2016.

Over the summer, Rick and various members of the committee plan to gather information and support from key members of LFUCG as well as elected officials, non-profits that work in the housing sector, and others.

Members of CKCPJ will receive ongoing information about the progress of the Housing Justice Project. The committee meets at the Quaker Meeting House, 649 Price Avenue, Lexington, at 7 p.m. on the second Tuesday of the month. The date for the next meeting is Tues., May 10.

Lexington Working Families Campaign met at the Quaker Meeting House on April 19 to discuss the progress of a local ordinance designed to provide monitoring of wage violations in Lexington.

Currently the committee is identifying groups that can assist in the public awareness portion of the campaign and are in the process of contacting members of the Community Action Council, the Human Rights Commission, labor unions, Kentucky NOW, the NAACP, KFTC, and various faith communities.

With the assistance of Kentucky Equal Justice Center attorney McKenzie Cantrell, CKCPJ co-chair David Christiansen is creating a PowerPoint presentation that will be used during the awareness campaign that will be launched in late spring.

A particular point of focus will be the higher minimum wage in Lexington, scheduled to increase to $8.10 on July 1. The public education campaign will include information about contact resources to report if an employee is not being paid correctly.

To schedule a presentation, contact David Christiansen, davidccky@gmail.com.

The CKCPJ Peace Action Committee met at the Quaker Meeting House on April 20. The areas of interest for the committee are international peacemaking, advocating and educating about non-violent solutions to conflict, opposing militarism and military spending, and opposition to war, educating about climate disruption and advocating for sensible gun regulations.

The committee is currently working with members of Lexington's minority communities to identify people who can train trainers for non-violence projects. Trainees must be people who have "bought into" the value and practice of non-violence, not those dubious about the concept or process. The committee agreed that it is essential that trainers represent diverse communities in Central Kentucky, especially persons working with youth.

The committee is investigating Rebecca Glasscock's suggestion that CKCPJ move away from its campaign of gathering supporters for an official Kentucky "Peace Is Possible" license plate and produce a decorative plate to both promote the concept and raise needed funds for the work of CKCPJ. Discussion will continue at the May 18 meeting, 7 p.m., Quaker Meeting House, 649 Price Road, Lexington.

PFLAG welcomes all

by Linda Angelo and Jonathan Phillips

PFLAG Central Kentucky and CKCPJ are a natural fit. CKCPJ's central tenets include acceptance of diversity, dignity and human rights for all. Those principles are also central to PFLAG's mission of support, education and advocacy for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer/questioning (LGBTQ) people.

So, what does the PFLAG (we just say "P-flag") acronym stand for? Originally the letters signified Parents, Friends, and Families of Lesbians and Gays. We are proud of that legacy, but it no longer fully describes who we are. We recognize diverse sexualities and gender identities, and among our membership are LGBTQ adults as well as families who are advocating for their transgender children. Our meetings include allies such as faith leaders, counselors, activists, or people who wish to show support or learn more.

PFLAG's critical role is helping parents and family members—those who are bewildered and distressed, those who just want to get more comfortable or be better friends and family to their loved ones by learning all they can. Parents get additional knowledge and perspective from LGBTQ members and allies and support from other parents who understand the feelings and the challenges they experience. LGBTQ adults who have not experienced acceptance in their own families will find it at PFLAG. Others are there to remind us what their positive family experiences have meant to them.

PFLAG Central Kentucky is a welcoming family that offers wonderfully diverse perspectives. All of us look forward to a day when families will realize that their child who has come out as LGBTQ is the same child they loved yesterday. We know that acceptance and support from parents is the most crucial factor in the adjustment of LGBTQ youth.

PFLAG began in 1972 when Jeanne Manford took the step of marching alongside her gay son in New York's Pride Day parade. She was flooded with gays and lesbians asking that she talk to their parents, and PFLAG was born. Now there are hundreds of chapters around the world. For her lifelong advocacy work, Jeanne was awarded the Presidential Citizens

It's Even Worse Than It Looks:

How the American Constitutional System Collided with the New Politics of Extremism

Thomas E. Mann and Norman J. Ornstein.

Basic Books, 2012 (Foreword and Afterword, 2013). 240 pages

Reviewed by Jim Trammel

Two government researchers with decades of experience on Capitol Hill, and of opposite political persuasions, have jointly come to the conclusion that the trouble with Congress and national politics these days is mainly the Republican Party. Well, stop the presses, we all knew that.

They examine in this book the dynamics of how this happened over the years since the debt ceiling debacles. Published in 2012, it was updated in 2013 (and now also 2014, retitled It's Even Worse Than It WAS, hoo boy.) They assemble a jigsaw puzzle that looks well put together except for one large missing piece, which I'll get to below.

A major player in the gridlock game is our own native Patron Saint of Government Inaction, Sen. Mitch McConnell; but he turns out to be only one of a blame-worthy triumvirate. Newt Gingrich, the authors allege, set up this poisonous state of affairs as a conscious strategy going back as far as his election to the House in 1978.

Rep. Eric Cantor got his moment, as one of the radical-right Young Guns, bringing the strategy of political hostage-taking to fullest, cruelest flower by withholding aid for victims of Hurricane Irene and other disasters as a bargaining chip.

Best supporting actor in this farce might be Rep. John Mica (R-Fla.), who threw 24,000 construction workers out of jobs and cost the nation $300 million in lost taxes because he dug in his heels over the issue of subsidies to small local airports.

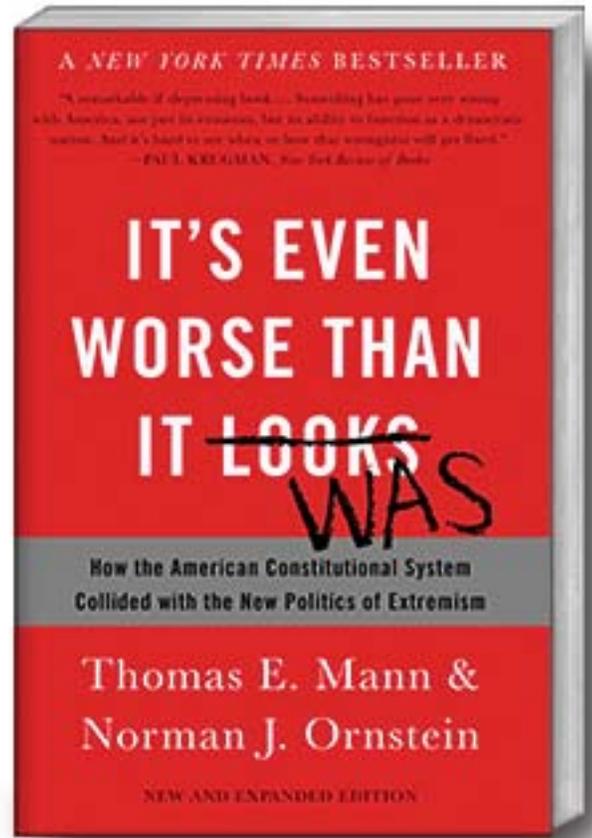

The authors like the parliamentary theory of government, preferring it to the American system of compromising to achieve goals. In a section of admittedly impractical solutions to our American governance problem, they suggest shadow governments as in European parliaments—a whole out-of-office set of bureaucrats-without-portfolio, waiting to pounce and work their will the day they get an electoral majority, with utter disregard for the other party, which then takes their turn in the shadows.

Almost as impossible is their mandatory voting idea, patterned on Australia, where everybody votes or pays a small fine. Wouldn't fly, they admit. I don't think it would help much if we had it — far too many ignorant voters are already threatening to cast ballots.

Supporting currents in this river of filth include the media, complicit because they subscribe to false equivalency in their coverage. The authors' liken it to giving equal weight to the viewpoints of the hit-and-run driver and the victim. Here's an example: In 2010 a Senate bill, the DISCLOSE Act, would have forced identification of political donors who had been newly granted anonymity by the Citizens United Supreme Court decision. But the DISCLOSE Act was filibustered. All 59 Senate Democrats voted to end the filibuster, one short of the required 60. The DISCLOSE Act failed. "It died in Congress," was the popular media report, letting Senate Republicans wiggle off the hook.

Democrats bear a percentage of the fault for government inaction, but it's a smaller part, and mostly relates to the party banding together in 1987 to deny Robert Bork a Supreme Court seat. (And, children, Democrats didn't like Bork because he fired Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox back in the '70s, when your grandmother and I were in college.)

Both Democrats and Republicans are becoming ever more stridently partisan, and even Independents these days are closet partisans (one poll the authors cite has only 10 percent of voters identifying as truly independent). But Democrats have never advocated shutting down the government, interrupting the flow of unemployment benefits and other social services, or defaulting on government obligations and causing a credit downgrade. The Republicans have.

In the film "Double Indemnity," Barbara Stanwyck's character says she and her partner-in-insurance-crime Fred MacMurray are both rotten. He replies, "Only, you're a little more rotten." Thus with the parties in D.C.

Oh, and the large puzzle piece the authors left out? They never once attribute to racism Republican resistance to President Obama's policies. Never mention it once. I computer-searched the text. A glaring omission. All you have to do is look around a little in Kentucky to discover that truth. But maybe they hide it better in Washington.

Reviewer Jim Trammel doesn't have the stamina for a filibuster.

"There is a higher court than courts of justice, and that is the court of conscience. It supersedes all other courts."

PREP Talks: Local Food, Food Security & Justice

By Kelly Duffy

Do you know the typical fate of three-legged carrots?

Have you ever heard of kohlrabi?

If your answer is “No” to either question you’re not alone. When Lexington’s Community Action Council hosted the second installment of its PREP Talks series (Prevent, Reduce and Eliminate Poverty) the audience was full of self-proclaimed “novices” when it came to knowledge of local food systems and movements. In an interactive Twitter poll, most said they were a “2” on a 1-5 scale. Thankfully, an informative panel of community advocates, activists, and foodies were on hand to educate.

The audience learned that most three-legged carrots, although perfectly safe and nutritious, ultimately end up as waste because they don’t meet supermarket standards of beauty. In fact, a THIRD of U.S. food ultimately ends up as waste. Appalling, right? France thought so.

The French Parliament recently made it illegal for supermarkets to waste food required them to donate or compost anything that is unsold. Community advocates hope to see similar legislation enacted nationally, but for now, GleanKY, a non-profit organization that helps combat food waste and hunger in Fayette County and throughout Kentucky, visits local grocery stores and farms to collect excess produce and distributes directly to those who need access to it most.

Lexington Farmers’ Market encourages healthy consumption outside of the grocery store with produce born and bred right here locally. Their “Double Dollars” program allows customers who purchase food with SNAP benefits the opportunity to double their money. For $10 they can get $20 worth of produce, making fresh, local produce available and affordable for all Lexingtonians. The program enables farmers to be paid for their crops instead of having to donate or waste them.

Now, kohlrabi is a turnip cabbage that is a bit milder and sweeter than broccoli stems and cabbage hearts. Most people probably didn’t know that, but that’s why people like Jim Embry are so important to our community. Jim helps neighborhoods cultivate community gardens so that people of all ages and backgrounds can not only identify food, but grow it for themselves. Dr. Keiko Tanaka works to educate University of Kentucky students on similar topics. She teaches sociology classes that help students understand the politics of food safety, localization, and health.

It seems that if utilized justly, there is plenty of food to go around. The real challenge is ensuring all Lexingtonians have a seat at the table.

For more information about GleanKY, see gleanky.org.

Kelly is an advocate and a board member of Community Action Council.
